I want the binary client to read and write messages to a socket in a separate module. The problem is, node.js seems to block I/O for other threads, so the binary client runs, and just hangs - as it cannot make any progress for some time. It's not until something else triggers a write to the socket - like a message from the monitor - that the binary client will write. Does anyone know if node.js has any kind of thread/process/I/O scheduling/limitations? A: This is what you would need to do: var net = require('net'); var socket = new net.Socket(); socket.connect(3000, '127.0.0.1', function() { socket.write('Hello, I
