Q: Help with UI for AJAX query What would you suggest as the best UI for making an AJAX query? I have made a view and then a page view of the results. Each row has a 'Save' button which performs an AJAX query and updates the table. Is there anything wrong with this way of doing it? Should the whole row be updated or could I have just the element that changed updated?

A: Quoting myself (from the comments), I suggest to create an "Update button" which updates the entire table (for example, the current row). I have seen in the examples of tables in jQuery Mobile that each row has an attribute called "data-position" and that the row is inserted and updated only when the attribute is set to "insertAfter". If the row doesn't have the data-position set, as in my example, it is inserted in the position where the last row was before updating the table (as in your example with the page view of the results). This will not destroy the UI or the user experience, as all rows are updated.

A: A good way is to use a very simple form on the page that submits to a server (use a PHP form handler, but any languages, or even JavaScript), using something like `$.post("test.php", { data: value }, function(response) { //We got a response, do something with it });`

test.php Does some basic checking on the post info... eg. if any of the fields are missing, oops don't do anything... if any of the fields are out of range, warn them.. if the data is of a type it doesn't recognise (eg numeric), then tell them they are out of range... if they have a valid login but the password is out of range, then alert them. If they have a valid login but the password is a bad one... well you have to decide what you tell them, what they are doing wrong, etc. to the Seattle Cancer Care Alliance and the Seattle Children's Hospital Cancer and Blood

The wording is broad, so maybe just ask questions or something? I have a few scripts I've written, but I'm sure I'm far from learning what I need to.
