To study the effects of the 0.5- μ m etching process on the fatigue life of titanium for orthodontic brackets and to evaluate the effects of surface treatment on bracket failure modes. Fatigue tests with linear loading were performed in water on 67 titanium brackets. The brackets were divided into four groups: titanium without treatment, titanium with 5%-phosphoric acid treatment, titanium with 15% hydrofluoric acid treatment, and titanium with 0.5- μ m etching. The fatigue life was measured as the number of cycles (N) to failure. Two brackets in the 0.5- μ m etching group failed in the fatigue tests. The fatigue life of the control group was 198,000 cycles; that of the phosphoric acid and hydrofluoric acid groups was 165,000 and 72,000 cycles, respectively. The differences between the 0.5- μ m etching group and the phosphoric acid and hydrofluoric acid groups were statistically significant (P als, 157 _see also_ mosquitoes muriqui porcupines, 86, 87, 91, 93 myrrh, 248 N naked-eye monkeys,
